War und Clusten (From " The War and General Cullu a - Conversations" By the Author of "Friends in Council," in the Contemporary Review.) I am perfectly aware that a political opinion will thoroughly overcome the interest of this class, (the artizan,) and may determine them for war: but I am sure that their interests point to pence; and, as they become more and more instructed, and less and less amenable to political passion or prejudice, they will become earnest favourers of peace. I rely much upon them now; and I look forward to still greater and surer support from them bereafter. Now. with respect to the higher classes, let us look at the motives by which they are likely to be netuated; and let us see who, amongst them, are likely to be invourers of war, and who on the contrary, are likely to view war with eminent disfavour. Let us begin with the learned professions. The clergy protest, officially as it were, but at the same time very sincerely. against the horrors and cruelties of war; but they do not, and probably they cannot, do much as a body to prevent it. Observe how little head the clergy in France have made against the perpetration of this present war. am not disposed to blame them overmuch. am quite sure that as a body they are furourers of peace; but it is evident that they have either very little power to prevent war, or their pence-bying desires are overbalanced by political considerations having reference to the state of their Church. I come now to the lawyers. To them war is not useful for after all they thrive with the general thriving of the community in which they live. But, on the other hand, war is not specially injurions to thom. Their dealings are with the richer classes, who are the latest to be ninched by the dire calamities of war. A small tradesman suffers far more from war than a great. dawyer does; but, again, his sufferinge, as regards his interests, are not by any means so acute and pressing as those of the artisan. By who are employed in manufacturing the insignificant. I come now to the doctors. I Garden. Gas and Water laid on Apply to contend that their interest does not affect them much either way. They are already so generous to the poor (I love the doctors) that they do not suffer much, pecuniarily speaking. when the poor become a little poorer. The doctors, as the lawyers, live upon the richer classes. They (the doctors) probably appreciate the sufferings caused by war-the physical sufferings-more scarately, and with more feeling, than any other persons do. I am therefore disposed to reckon them on my side; that is, on the side of those who detest and abher war; and who would do everything in their power to prevent it throughout the world. But these doctors and surgeons—for of course I included surgeons—are but a small body, and can hardly fight their own battles, set aside the hattles of other people. They have always been | taken in March next. Apply to _____ neglected by the State. I now come to science, art, and literature. I must thank you for your kindness in listening to me so patiently. I am making a speech to you, no it were, and a peripatetic speech [Mr. Milverton was walkyou to hear all that I have to say, without interrupting me, reserving your protests until I have finished. I believe that I, and the people who think with me in this matter, have ardent supporters amongst the learned, the artistic, and the scientific; and, what is more, venture to say that a similar statement may be made as regards the feelings of these classes. throughout all ages. I asked Theodore Martin, who has written an admirable life of Horace, in life which shows to us not only the nature and domestic doings of Horace, but the aspect of the Roman world in which he lived), whether Horace was really a man of pence; and Martin preferred me to that ode in which Horace, addressing Augustus, who brings back with him peace to Rome, beautifully enuminted the bene parmulá, for Horace was no coward) :-

"Tutus bos etenim rura perambalat : Nutrit rura Oeres, almaque Funstitas; Pacitum' volitant per mare navitm': Culpari metuit Pides." This is how Martin translates it:

" For safe the herds range field and fen, Full-headed stand the shocks of grain, Our sailors sweep the peaceful main. And man can trust his fellow-men." And then there is this charming stanza: "Now each man, basking on his slopes, Weds to his widow'd trees the vine. Then, as he gaily qualfs his wine, Salutes thee, God of all his hopes."

I should weary you, if I were to shew you how. from the earliest times, the greatest men in science, literature, and art have protested against needless warfare. You may say that it has been for their interest to make this protest:

as been for their interest to make this protest:

at Pokfoolum, and known as "BELscience, literature, and art droop their heads when war uprears her gory figure. But the men of science, literature, and art, are the most disinterested of marking otherwise the description of J. Agents for the above Companies, are present in the occupation of J. MENKE. Esq. But, again, they are a scattered people, and have not much direct influence with statesmen and electors. Let us pass them by 1 come now to the only class which can, and does, act somewhat as a consistent and concentrated body -the civil service. Now, the words "civil service" I mean to use in a most extended sense. Probably some of you may hereafter find broader words to include all the persons whom I mean to include in this phrase. I do not mean merely the civil servants attached to Government, but all those who have to direct and man- city. Apply to age the civil affairs of this world, the great leaders of commerce, the directors of railways, the heads of greatmanufacturing firms, municipal corpora-tions, together with all those major or minor persons to whose guidance and governance is given the material and mental progress of the civiling tion of the world. Let me beg of you to notice how this class grows and increases, pari passu, with the increasing civiliention of the world. Attila and his Huns were all of them, naturally, for war. An English baron and his retainers, some hundreds of years ago, were all of them, naturally, for war. But now there have grown up numerous and potential clusses whose interests are not at all for war; and, if some foolish sen, can be had on 1st April next. timent on their part is not enlisted in favour of war, or if a nobler sentiment prevails, overcoming the nonsense of glory and territorial acquisition, these classes would always be against war. I now come to that part of my discourse (for I fear it is something like a discourse) in which I should desire my friend Machiavelli, were be in the land of the living, to come to my aid. For the moment, let us confine the words "civil service" to that class to which those words are commonly applied. I would like, however, to include members of Parliament, who are now (considering the details of government with which they deal) practically members of the which they deal) practically members of the which they deal) practically members of the for the fact that they have had twenty-five infinited to war. Their interests, their sentiments, their habits, are thoroughly unwarlke. Moreover, what are called the baser motives move in this same direction. The present war has given civil servants throughout the world a great deal of trouble. I have no doubt it would have given Sir Arthur and Oranner a good deal of trouble, if they had been in office at this time. Then, again, the civil servants are not so very fond of seeing men with cocks!

Luatly, I would ask you, can there be anything more unfortunate for the pence of the world than the militury and civil services being confounded together? At this moment; is it not a thing to be greatly regretted that a prime minister is at the some time a major in a regiment of cavalry P Before I conclude, I must dispose of an objection which in j and 1 lb. Tins, is, otherwise, sure to be made. It is that the These Soups are of superior quality, and cheaper prossure of war, whether actual or impending, to the consumer than any in the market; from invaded is very different from that in a country which is likely to bear the brunt of the war disposition to hinder or promote war of the different classes and persons whose motives have been considering. Again, as an example of the effect of this difference of circumstance. may refer to what I have said about the awyers. I said that their interests were, comparatively speaking, very little touched by war. Indeed, litigation, which is a kind of warfare and not the least formidable kind, may even he promoted by a state of war. Nevertheless, when a country comes to be largely invaded, and its principal cities besieged, law becomes as silent as literature. It would be almost inpossible to exhaust the combinations of cirnumstances which would tend to vary the condusions I have put forth as to the proponess to. r aversion from war, in different classes of the community. The utmost that can be done, which, however, it is very desirable should be done,) is, to form some general conclusions. and then to see how the motives I have adduced as affecting different classes will be weakoned or intensified by the peculiar circumstances of each case.
